A medical spa in Idaho

September 2026 · Prepared by Luca Panetto

A close read of where visitors slip away before booking, and the handful of changes most likely to bring them back. Every finding was checked on the live site on 12 and 18 September 2026.

What is already working

An audit that only lists problems reads like a sales pitch. These are the strengths worth protecting.

Financing answered before anyone asks

A small panel reading “Pay over time. No hard credit checks. 0% APR options” stays on screen as visitors scroll, and “Payment Plans” has its own item in the main menu. For treatments at aesthetic price points, cost is the most common silent objection, and you answer it before anyone has to ask. Most clinics bury financing on a separate page, if they mention it at all.

Named product lines, not vague claims

The homepage names the brands you work with, DermaSweep and Epionce among them, and the page title names Dysport and dermal fillers. A patient researching a specific treatment can match what they have read about to what you offer. Specific names build more credibility than “medical grade technology” language.

Two locations, stated on every page

The footer gives the full street address of both locations on every page I opened. Someone deciding whether you are convenient can answer that question immediately, without hunting for a contact page.

Protect these while you fix the leaks on the following pages.

Your booking page offers flu shots, not Botox

What I found

Your site has an online booking page at /book-online. Its title reads “Book Online Your Med Spa Appointment”. The services a visitor can actually book there are Blood Work ($25), Physical Exams ($25), Mental Health ($25), Flu Shot ($45), Prevention & Wellness ($53), Family Planning ($35), General Health ($25), Home Visits ($53) and Pediatric Consultation ($30). These are the sample services of a general medical clinic template. Not one aesthetic treatment can be booked on that page. I read the list on the live page on 18 September.

Why it matters

A visitor who reaches this page wants to book Botox or a filler and finds a pediatric consultation instead. The likely reading is not “this page is unfinished” but “I am in the wrong place”. It is the page furthest down the funnel: the people who reach it are the ones closest to paying you, and it is where they are lost.

What fixing it changes

This is the most valuable fix on your site. Every visitor who arrives here has already decided they are interested. They are being lost at the last step, not the first.

The fix

Replace the nine template services with your real bookable treatments, with durations and either real prices or a consultation booking. If the page cannot be updated soon, unpublish it: no booking page is better than one that advertises flu shots.

Every booking button leads to a form, not a calendar

What I found

The three buttons on your homepage that say book, “Book your appointment”, “Book a party today!” and the menu item “Contact/Book Now!”, all open the same page: a heading that says Contact Us, a phone number, two addresses and a four field form (Name, Email, Subject, Message). No calendar, no times to choose from, no embedded scheduler of any kind. I checked all three links on 18 September. Your real booking page exists, but nothing in the menu points to it: the only link to it from the homepage is a single hyphen, five pixels wide, sitting off the left edge of the screen where it cannot be clicked.

Why it matters

A button labelled “Book your appointment” sets a specific expectation: the visitor is about to choose a time. Arriving at a message form asks for more work than they agreed to, and then a wait with no idea how long. Evenings and weekends are when aesthetic patients browse and when your phone is least likely to be answered, so the gap between intent and confirmation is widest exactly when interest is highest. Booking by phone and text is a fair choice, and I do not suggest removing it. The problem is the wording: the button promises one thing and delivers another.

What fixing it changes

Pointing the buttons you already have at a working booking page turns intent into confirmed appointments without any new infrastructure. The pieces exist. They are not connected.

The fix

Once /book-online lists your real treatments, repoint “Book your appointment” and “Book a party today!” to it and add it to the menu. Keep the contact page for genuine enquiries, and keep call or text prominent for people who prefer it. The aim is to add a self service path, not remove the phone.

A visitor never sees a review without leaving your site

What I found

On the homepage the words review, testimonial, rating and before and after occur zero times, and the structured data your site sends to search engines carries no aggregateRating. The one quote on the page is signed by a member of your staff, not by a patient. I did not check your Google profile for this sample, and your reviews may well be there. What I measured is that the site itself shows none of them.

Why it matters

Patients choosing an injector look for other patients first. A visitor who arrives from an ad or a link has to leave your site to find out what anyone thinks of you, and a share of them will not come back. Reviews that already exist on Google cost nothing to show here.

What fixing it changes

Showing three or four named reviews near the booking buttons removes one reason to hesitate at the moment of decision. It will not by itself increase bookings, but it stops sending people away to look.

The fix

Embed a handful of your Google reviews, with first names and dates, close to “Book your appointment”, and link to the full list. If you have before and after photos with consent, one row of them does the same job.

The homepage ends in a screen of empty space

What I found

Near the bottom of your homepage, between the last section of content and the footer, there is an empty white gap about 575 pixels tall, the height of most of a laptop screen, with one character of text in it: a hyphen. A social feed is meant to be there and shows nothing. I measured the empty container on 12 September and photographed the same gap twice on 18 September, ten seconds apart, on a different machine. It did not fill.

Why it matters

The end of a page is where a visitor who has read everything decides what to do next, and yours currently offers a void. A large empty gap reads as a page that is broken or half finished, which undercuts the credibility the rest of the site works to build.

What fixing it changes

Recovering this space turns dead screen into a final booking prompt at the exact point where the most engaged visitors finish reading.

The fix

Either repair the feed so it shows real posts, or delete the empty block and close the gap. Whichever you choose, end the page on a single clear booking button.

Where to start, in order

In the order I would tackle them: highest return for least effort first.

01 Replace the template services on /book-online with real treatments

Ties back to Leak 01. Effort: medium

02 Repoint the three booking buttons and add the page to the menu

Ties back to Leak 02. Effort: low

03 Show a few Google reviews next to the booking buttons

Ties back to Leak 03. Effort: low

04 Close the empty gap at the bottom of the homepage

Ties back to Leak 04. Effort: low

What this audit does not contain

- Any percentage, any revenue estimate, any borrowed industry figure. The impact of each leak is described, not invented.
- Anything I could not confirm on the second visit. A finding that held on 12 September but not on 18 September was left out.
- Your Google profile, your ads or your phone line. This is the website, read the way a patient reads it.
